In the police court Tuesday morning, Carl Israel was found not guilty of assault on Ernest Bellevance, this decision being handed down by Judge Frank H. Moss. The assault was alleged to have taken place at the restaurant owned by Israel's father on the evening of June 18th. According to the story of Israel he and his father had warned Bellevance to keep out of their place of business because of his habit of swearing and of arguing with customers. He persisted in coming in, however, and on the evening named came into the restaurant with Raymond T. James, a railroad man. Carl Israel told him to go outside, but Bellevance refused and then Israel came from behind the counter and opened the door leading to the street. Bellevance again refused and Israel took him by the arm, but the former wrapped his legs about the rail and held onto the stool. In the scuffle the top of the stool came off and struck Bellevance on the nose, causing it to bleed. Mr. Israel, father of the accused, who was in the kitchen heard the noise and came to the aid of his son. Taking Bellevance by the seat of his trousers he carried him outside and stood him on his feet on the sidewalk. Bellevance admitted he did not know whether Israel struck him or not but knew his nose had bled. Three other witnesses testified in Israel's behalf. The court then found the defendant not guilty.

Heading the vaudeville bill at the Davis today is Bowers, Walters and Croker. "The Three Rubes," who present one of these composite offerings that can be called "indiscreetable." They are three active "tube cut-outs" and the melange they present with grotesque acrobatic work, music, singing, country dancing and eccentric falls, is exceedingly funny. The act is led by Jack Jones, who was a British tommy. No matter what hardship he was forced to endure his face always wore a smile and his buddies called him "The Boy with the Smile." At the battle of the Marne, Joyce was severely wounded necessitating the amputation of a leg but never did his smile forsake him and when he was discharged from the hospital he started in to see just what he could do with one leg. Burns and Wilson come next in their clever sketch "The Untrained Nurse." Their fifteen minute act is full of joy of spirit and no drugs no dope has been used. The comedy sketch is "The New Mix in 'The Feud'." "The Feud" deals with the heritage of hate between two rival clans of the Bluegrass region. Paramount Screen Magazine completes the show.
